The combination of film studies with more theoretical discussions felt balanced. The discussions from the readings worked well with the films we were viewing. Film clips helped aid our memory and give us new insight into techniques. I appreciated the teacher and student collaboration and tag-team in facilitating, not lecturing the class.

Having two teachers present to share their insights and explain technical and theoretical perspectives only heightens our knowledge of each film. I imagine that the both of you also benefit greatly from this process. Not only are you able to feed of each other's knowledge of film, but you are also able to more accurately measure student comprehension, something that I feel is occasionally absent in classes taught by an individual professor or graduate student.
